Each locking shoe is equipped with a spring-loaded pin, which projects in the longitudinal direction from the locking shoe and engages in a socket of the closed grab and which is locked in a pin-locking groove arranged in the longitudinal direction on the corresponding closed grab. One part of the locking shoe is formed as a base component, which is also provided with a pin-locking recess. When the closed grab is moved away from the railway track, the pin remains in the pin-locking groove of the closed grab. At the same time, the base component of the locking shoe is subjected to a force, with which the pin is pressed into the pin-locking recess of the base component. In this case, a tilting surface, which extends in the longitudinal direction and is arranged on a wall of the pin-locking recess, acts on the pin, with which surface the pin enters the pin-locking recess when it is pressed by a force acting in a longitudinal direction. The tilting surface has the task of the pin being pushed into the pin-locking recess even when a force acting on the base component is greater than the force, with which the pin is pressed into the pin-locking recess. Furthermore, a mechanical locking system of the closed grab can be used, in which the closed grab is linked to the rack by a bolt at one or more locations. To this end, the closed grab has an opening, which receives the bolt and in which the closed grab can be connected with the rack. The two components are mechanically linked to one another via the bolt in the form of a rotating and/or axial bolt, which can be unlocked by the locking shoe and which, when unlocked, can be moved to a locked state. Further examples of mechanical locking systems of this type are described in DE 44 40 746 A
