What's your IP address? Where were you on the day the California wildfires started? In about a week, the U.S. government will know. The Department of Homeland Security wants to hire a contractor to track every phone and computer that accesses the federal government and periodically check to see if any of those devices are connected to California on May 6, 2019. That day, the Camp fire started destroying the town of Paradise, California, home to 50,000 people. In an announcement published Tuesday, the Department of Homeland Security said it wants a "Trace Collection Provider" to "collect IP addresses and geolocation data" to compile a more comprehensive picture of where and when Californians were online on the day the fire started. The agency added that it is going to use "a non-intrusive approach" and that it won't need to see any data it collects.

The request for proposals, posted on the FedBizOps website, asks for companies that would "collect data and supply a dynamic and real-time view of the nation and certain regions of the United States," according to a copy of the document reviewed by WIRED. The request is based on the 2018 Homeland Security Presidential Directive-12, which requires DHS to "coordinate and provide for the collection, maintenance, and analysis of system and network-based information." The contractor would take a "snapshot" of all the internet addresses connected to the federal government on May 6, 2019, and "export that data into an external data repository." Another request submitted to the Federal Business Opportunities website states that the contractor must use a "non-intrusive collection methodology" on internet-connected devices and offer a "customizable solution." The request is for a "rental and maintenance model," according to the document. The goal is to provide "a more complete picture of consumers online across all devices and networks," Homeland Security explained in an announcement. "Under [the] JWICS program, the department is able to access the full utility of the telecommunications infrastructure and network services that the nation's internet users routinely employ to connect to the internet, including the internet's reach, accessibility, and quality of service." When the California wildfires broke out the week of October 8th, 2018, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) deployed its National Incident Management System for Wildland Fires. That would mean that every time a person—from an individual to a company getting the exception, but what you are doing is opening a file in read/write mode. This doesn't allow you to write to a file until the other process has closed the file. You could open the file in read-only mode, which would work (it is tricky to code, as you need to open the stream, read it and then close it). Given that this is a bug in Android, the `openFile()` method takes a flags parameter that lets you open the file in read-only mode.
