A new study has revealed that estrogen receptors (ERs) in breast cancer cells can be activated by chemical and radiological exposures to produce DNA damage. Findings suggest that exposure to moderate doses of the nuclear decay product alpha (α)-particles could act as weak estrogen receptor agonists. Further, the study provides a basis for development of novel therapies based on the targeted delivery of α-particle emitters, such as radium-223, to receptor expressing tumor cells. When seeking drugs to treat the 2.5-million annual cases of breast cancer, researchers have focused on estrogen receptor (ER) signaling as a treatment target. Although researchers had considered ERs to be "dysregulated" cell-surface receptors, they were surprised to find that they could act as transcription factors, affecting gene expression, in the nucleus. Although estrogen levels fluctuate during the menstrual cycle and in the post-menopausal period, most people do not suffer from this issue because ERs also act as sensors to respond to low levels of the natural estrogen hormones, the researchers explain. ERs bind to cellular DNA and to estrogen messenger RNA (mRNA) in the cell's nucleus. The researchers used a standard estrogenic chemopreventive agent, tamoxifen, to induce ER-dependent gene expression. They found that they could activate ERs in cells by exposing them to α-particles, a nuclear decay product of radioactive decay. Then they determined whether an α-particle could activate other receptors like ER-β, the β-isomer of ER-α, or all the members of the ER family. Importantly, the researchers showed that within ER-positive breast miles of gray rock and dead Martian landscape. A 2010 Mars rover called Curiosity is still on the Red Planet. It's been climbing through the crater it landed in last August. Engineers spent months analyzing data from the rover's cameras and other instruments. The rest of the soil sciences program seemed a lot like so many of the other projects scientists do at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory, Calif. Biological samples, laser-beamed into the Martian dust, show there was a microbe in the colony of tiny, oozy grains. Darwin thought evolution would have taken millions of years. The colonists got around that by putting the microbes on early ancestor species, alive and adapted to weird conditions. Parallel evolution On Mars, when evolution happened, it happened fast. For example, when the colonists left for the Red Planet, they took one of their ancestors with them. A new, larger version of that same ancestor adapted to the new environment at a rate no one outside the Mars colonists could follow. It became a key element in the colonists' robot voice. As the colonists worked in the colony's new habitat, picking up samples to bring back, they would encourage the ancestor microbes to do their work too. The ancestors, in turn, would call back to them to describe what they were seeing with the rover's cameras. The ancestor robots worked side by side with people, helping to understand the nature of colonization on Mars. "We're not the only ones going, 'Whoa, is this happening?' to Mars," said Chris McKay, project manager for Curiosity. Studying Mars Mapping ancient Mars is something San Diego chemical engineer Stewart Springer does for his day job. But NASA recruited him to do a second job. Mars Latest News & Updates After a long, cold winter, spring has arrived on Mars, making it difficult for the robot's GPS antenna to see the environment on the dry surface, said John Grotzinger, project scientist for NASA's Mars Science Laboratory. Sixty-three years ago, Finnish cosmonaut Enzo Carlotto wrenched his spacecraft around to a new orbit for one of the first experiments the Soviet space program did in the 1960s. The probe is running out of fuel and needs a final push to get to its science destination. In this slowed-down version of itself, Carlotto
