What's New In?

In the year 2020, we will be in the presence of a brand-new release of exuberant, extensive, and all-encompassing blockchain software. Released every 2 years, the protocol upgrades are a simultaneous escalation of Blockchain's architecture. Newer versions of Blockchain are able to improve, streamline, and "improve" its built-in features. The blockchain is a trust-minimized model. Trust is a cultural metaphor for failure or success; a form of merit that gives an asset a value. This value is not mechanical; rather, it is determined by human life decisions made by a group of people who have a stake in the value of the token they're having. Blockchain is a public ledger. It is a distributed network of blocks where "time-stamped" transactions are always recorded. It is a decentralized network where every node is a participant, and each participant is authenticated with a cryptographic public key. Transactions cannot be altered by malicious re-entering a set of similar transactions, nor by acting as more than one party to a transaction. When implementing blockchain as a software architecture, the three most common areas of focus are: Practicality: The practical, everyday applications of the protocol are putting the token economy to use. Let's consider some popular examples: E-commerce: Payment is not only done with cash, but with tokens too. Amazon's Amazon Coins are an example of a token that empowers individuals to spend money on Amazon products. Social media: Tokens have been introduced in the form of Facebook Credits, GiftCards, and users' own virtual currencies to express their rewards with network members. Governance: Blockchain is not just a new financial architecture; it's a new overall governance architecture. In contrast to the current model of incumbent democracy, a blockchain is a distributed network of democratic applications, where governance is practiced through a plurality of people and not a singular representative. We have to look at the application level where the majority of our business models, our social models, and our creative models will be practiced. We are headed towards a distributed network of dominant entities: for instance, for regulatory compliance we have FinTech companies that are rapidly deploying and working on blockchain initiatives, acting as intermediaries. They serve as gatekeepers of essential information (i.e. government regulations) as well as transmitters of information (
