Furthermore, it seems that cardiac differentiation may modulate the expression of myocardin [2]. These data underline the important contribution of some cardiac-specific transcriptional factors, as well as matrix proteins and receptors, in cardiomyocyte commitment. However, it should be underlined that cardiac commitment in pluripotent stem cells is a complex process and it is not always associated with the expression of cardiac transcriptional factors. In this respect, the embryonic stem cell-derived cardiomyocytes are able to spontaneously differentiate from the pluripotent state, and retain immature features such as the expression of cardiac transcription factors, low expression of  $\beta$ -MHC, and lack of well-organized sarcomere arrangements, as compared to terminally differentiated adult cardiomyocytes [3]. Conversely, non-cardiomyocyte progeny may also emerge, as demonstrated by the transcriptional profiling of cardiovascular progenitors derived from iPS cells, which demonstrated higher endothelial commitment, and lower cardiac commitment, with greater cardiomyocyte maturation efficiency [4]. Other studies have shown that there is an important contribution of mesodermal precursors in endocardial and vascular smooth muscle cell formation [5,6], although it has been also demonstrated that some cardiovascular-competent cells are isolated directly from human iPS cells. Thus, our own group has demonstrated that iPS cells are able to derive c-kit positive cardiac progenitors which are able to differentiate into endocardial cells and coronary smooth muscle cells [7]. This suggests that iPS cells may be a potentially interesting starting cell source to obtain reliable, large-scale, autologous cell sources for autologous heart regeneration. 6. Future
