II. Sensory stimulation of the gastrointestinal tract influences the hypothalamic reflex arc]. The effects of stimulation of the gastrointestinal tract on the renal and the hypothalamic component of drinking behaviour were studied. In chronic anesthetized rats, the oesophagus, stomach and small and large intestine were catheterized. The renal component of the drinking behaviour was monitored by means of the infusion of hypotonic solution. The hypothalamic component was indicated by two inhibition of drinking caused by icv infusion of LHRH or by electrolytic lesion of the ventrolateral hypothalamus. The results obtained with icv infusions of LHRH, cholinergic receptor agonists or sulphated polysaccharides indicate that the stimulation of the gastrointestinal tract inhibits drinking behaviour by a central mechanism involving the hypothalamus. It is suggested that the inhibitory influence of the stimulation of the gastrointestinal tract on the hypothalamic component of the drinking behaviour is, at least partly, a feed-back mechanism.Degree of specialization and habitat structure in a mesocarnivore-herbivore community. Territoriality limits dispersal between highly patchy habitats, leading to intraspecific differentiation (specialization) as a consequence of spatial and genetic structure. However, such specialization may be maladaptive in some species, reducing fitness by limiting foraging opportunities. Vegetation structural complexity is often assumed to be the key factor to drive resource partitioning, but among-habitat variation in structural complexity is also often highly variable and may not be strong enough to explain all observed specialization. We measured vegetation structural complexity at a local scale in two contrasting, and structurally highly differentiated, habitat types in a mesocarnivore-herbivore community to determine whether observed resource partitioning is the result of habitat differentiation, habitat structuring, or both. We also used a plant species panel b7e8fdf5c8
