car a few years ago the idea of self-driving cars is starting to garner a lot of attention, but the technology behind the self-driving car isn't quite there yet. Tesla's autopilot system has already been criticized for things like hitting objects, and losing control of the car. Audi's new self-driving car prototype "A8" will allow it to drive on roads and highways without the need of steering and accelerating. While it looks incredibly impressive, no self-driving cars are currently capable of driving on roads that are marked for use by cars and a few tech companies are actively working on perfecting this technology. For now, we can only hope that a self-driving car with no steering wheel and accelerator pedal is coming at some point. Self-Driving Cars Are On The Rise In fact, this year saw a 300 percent increase in traffic fatalities. Many people believe that self-driving cars may actually be one of the best ways to drastically reduce traffic fatalities, as most of the people who get into traffic accidents are over the age of 35, and have many other health issues. Technology innovator Doug Aamoth of Coursera, is actually working on perfecting the self-driving car. At the International Road Dynamics Conference in Washington D.C. Doug is presenting his work to the public about how he is using the MIT license plate to make self-driving cars. The current prototype consists of 16 sensors and is capable of driving from one state to another without any type of steering and acceleration needed. The software is capable of driving in high traffic areas like the Autobahn. Aamoth says that this self-driving car is actually capable of driving 3,000 miles without any type of steering assistance. In order to do this, he is using an algorithm that he called "centerline." Centerline is a natural trajectory of the
