You can use Photoshop as a non-destructive editing program, like many image editing programs. You don't have to worry about wrecking a photo when you alter it. Of course, you still might choose to go in a non-destructive way if you have a more important project you're working on and want to make sure that you don't change something you don't want changed. Photoshop is generally a robust program, so you can use it for a wide variety of non-destructive editing tasks, like retouching, compositing, cropping, adjusting white balance, adding special effects, creating title-style labels, and more. In this chapter, you discover how to make selections, brush on the right areas, blend images together, and edit text and graphic elements, among other things.

Getting Started with Photoshop Photoshop is built on a layer-based editing system. A lot of people equate layers with many different times of digital editing. In truth, a layer is the basic unit of an image file that holds all the bitmapped or vector data for a single image. A document, which is the collection of all the layers for an image, is considered the basic unit of Photoshop; it works as the file format that stores all your image files. As you create multiple layers and add them to the right areas of a document, the Photoshop program makes sure that you can edit each layer independently. This enables you to change a detail in the image one layer at a time, which is much easier than if you had to consider the entire image at once. The next few sections take you through each step of creating a new document. For even more information about creating images, check out Book 1, Chapter 2. Creating a new Photoshop document After creating a new project, you see the document window, which contains the last image in the project. The first step of creating a new document is to find where it's located on your hard drive or storage device. This is a rather cumbersome and time-consuming process if you can recall where you saved it in the first place.

However, it's a good way to ensure that your images are always saved and located in the same place. To find your documents, follow these steps: 1. Choose Window⇒Organizer to open the Organizer window. The Organizer window looks similar to Figure 13-1. It displays all the files on your computer that

Police in Tucson were searching Wednesday for the second time in a month for a woman who fled a GCSO vehicle. About 12:30 p.m., a GCSO officer was dispatched for a call of a suicide in a residence in the 1600 block of North Swan, according to a GCSO Facebook post. The suicide had happened earlier and there were no injuries, the post said. After talking with a witness, the officer determined the female had left the scene in a vehicle. The officer attempted to pull her over, but the woman fled the scene and continued to go south on Loop Road. About two hours later, a resident reported seeing a woman matching the description take a backpack into a house in the 200 block of West Redondo Drive, according to the post. About 7:30 p.m., the woman was taken into custody. She was identified as Tanya Sandoval, 31, of Tucson. She was booked into the Fourth Avenue Jail on a $100,000 bond. #3F51B5
