A process which produces a high quality silicone rubber is provided by a hydrosilylation reaction. Silicone rubber can be produced by, for example, a process in which a silicone-based monomer which is obtained by hydrolysis and condensation of a silane coupling agent and a silane oligomer is polymerized under the presence of a platinum-based catalyst. The catalyst that has been used in the hydrosilylation reaction is one which produces a Pt—Si bond. It has a disadvantage, however, in that platinum, which is a noble metal, is very expensive. Furthermore, a platinum-based catalyst is likely to be oxidized during use. There is then the problem of its water content increasing, so that the catalyst becomes ineffective. The by-product water content can be reduced by extending the contact time, but this increases the production cost. As a catalyst that does not employ a noble metal, for example, a method using an azoindacene compound that is an electron donor to silicon, or an organic titanium compound is known (Patent Document 1). A reaction product including titanium, however, is likely to decompose at high temperatures during processing, and the method is problematic in that its practical application is limited.Q: Can I Build an Inventory of Tools Without Breaking the Law? A substantial portion of current gold production depends on the development of very large cyanide acid leach solutions in conjunction with hematite ores. The quantity of gold thus processed is relatively small when compared to the total gold production, but the savings in processing costs is significant. For example, 10-15 ton per hour leach solutions are not uncommon.
