on the other hand, we're seeing more and more people starting up companies that don't actually need a significant amount of capital to get started, and possibly never will. so they're looking for founders who are more interested in having fun, and helping each other out. a successful start-up is a lot like a 50-state marathon. its fun and its challenging, but there are many participants who are just out for a healthy dose of exercise. and some just want to support a good cause. find people you know, trust, and enjoy--that's the best way to make a great team. from my experience (which is largely based on founding and working with late-night new businesses), most of the founders who actually end up succeeding were those who had a better chance at keeping their businesses going in the first place. those who were able to work things out with their partners, convince investors to keep them onboard, keep the project focused, and so on. if you have ideas, it's not too late to start building that novel you've been wanting to start. this low-cost model comprises two parts: 2,000-centimetre (1,093-yard) diameter earth-based microwave antenna, and the foundation for our earth-to-earth communication system. in may, the icrf began sending terrestrially, to see if the antenna works. "we have been performing test observations with it since the middle of may," says filipenko. "it's been working very well. for some frequencies there's some need for fine tuning, but the instrument works very nicely." it's a space telescope. the microboogie combines the technology of a rigorously tested 3d printer and a rotatable platform, to offer a breakthrough method of using 3d printed elements to create a complex telescope that is much cheaper than most. seiko has now patented the technology, and is making it available to universities and researchers. 5ec8ef588b
