In each case, either extension focuses on providing ArcGIS users with a set of tools that can save them time and let them get their work done more effectively. The trial version limitations of ET GeoWizards and the limitations of XTools Pro are discussed below. i.e., one license per organization, one-time fee, one user per organization, and so on. Additionally, ET GeoWizards users need ArcGIS Desktop Standard (or higher-level) and license activation. If you choose to use ET GeoWizards, your organizations ArcGIS users will be able to access many of the same tools offered by XTools Pro but with a significantly higher license cost than the price of the XTools Pro extension. In this case, your ArcGIS users will only have access to one or two tools that only XTools Pro offers. However, you'll still be able to perform many of the same tasks that are available through XTools Pro for a fraction of the cost. For example, viewing the data organization tab, which is only available when using XTools Pro, could save an organization time and money in the long run by increasing the efficiency of their GIS staff, especially when they're geographically dispersed. One word of caution, however: ET GeoWizards and XTools Pro both offer a wide range of functionality including many features that are only available to higher-level license holders. While doing so, they also introduce you to a few items that can be extremely useful, but that you may not need or want to use. Originally designed to enable ArcGIS users to quickly and easily make data available for use in other software, tools such as those found in XTools Pro (eg, the data folder layout tool) are now fully integrated into the desktop. That being said, simply removing the current ArcGIS Data Access extension is not enough to activate the tools found within XTools Pro. This article will walk you through the steps necessary to access the features found within XTools Pro.
