The gate structure generally includes a polysilicon layer and a gate dielectric layer, and is typically fabricated as follows. A polysilicon layer is blanket deposited over the substrate and anisotropically etched through openings in a photoresist mask to form polysilicon trenches. The photoresist mask is removed and the polysilicon trenches are filled with gate dielectric layer such as an oxide layer. A polysilicon layer is blanket deposited over the gate dielectric layer to form polysilicon gate structures. After planarization, source and drain structures are formed in the substrate proximate to the gate structure. It is known that polysilicon gate structures may be replaced with a metal gate structure. For a power MOSFET, such as a high voltage MOSFET, it is desired that the gate dielectric layer be made of a dielectric material that prevents the electric fields in the channel from overwhelming the gate dielectric layer. It is also desired that the gate dielectric layer withstand high electric fields. It is further desired that the gate dielectric layer be made of a dielectric material that is compatible with the metal gate structure. Suitable gate dielectric materials may be degraded, e.g., by forming carbon-based materials during the fabrication process. Thus, there is a need for gate dielectric layers that may be more easily fabricated as dielectric layers over 79a2804d6b
