“I think we can expect that in the upcoming elections, there will be a lot of new figures that will be supporting this coalition, not only Mr. (Cesar) Duarte, who is the current president, but other figures will see the importance of joining this coalition,” said Morais. Morais was a fugitive for two decades before making his first of two court appearances in 2002. He’s now been out of prison for 14 years. Morais said he wanted to talk with Duarte to push for support for the coalition. He said the coalition has hired international lawyers to help in its case against what it says are attempts to steal the presidency and exploit state resources. He said it could be difficult to get the support of the government of the U.S. “The U.S. is not going to support the establishment of a coalition of parties committed to the defense of democracy, which is in danger of falling,” he said. Crosman fired the first shot in the youth revolt, saying that his 16-year-old son no longer wanted to be a part of the “gun culture” at school. His son, Devin, became a prominent figure in the now-infamous Parkland, Fla., school shooting that killed 17 people in February. He returned to school briefly — posting on social media that he had been bullied for his activism — before dropping out for good. But the school’s response was to have Devin arrested and suspended. It resulted in both administrators being fired, and his parents being arrested. AD AD “They were aware of the discharge,” said an attorney representing their charges. In late February, the Crosman family went to an elementary school in a neighboring town to find a sticker that said “I love guns” on their son’s desk. The family couldn’t believe what they were seeing. “We went up to the principal and asked for the sticker to be removed,” Devin’s mother, Jamie, told The Post. Both the principal and assistant principal denied doing it. “They said, ‘We found the sticker
