The best way to get or keep Photoshop skills is to start practicing with the software from the very first day. Practicing by creating small projects to get familiar with the software is a creative way to keep the editing skills refreshed. Convince yourself to look at every image that you take through the view finder of your camera — the smaller the better. You can print them out, or use them as a reference to edit and enhance them as the best way to learn. In addition, there is no way to get better if you continue to use the same boundaries, which you can't break through without risk. That's why it's important to spend time as much as possible practicing new techniques, from the very beginning. The fact is that learning a new skill is a long and gradual process. You practice once and suddenly the skill is mastered. This exciting process is called expertise. The more you practice, the faster you learn the skill. The good part is that you can see the full scope of your passion in a few years. Of course, it takes more than the time devoted to skill practice. In order to master anything, you need the right tools. And it starts with a good computer. Photoshop is the most popular photo editing software in the world. The best way of learning is to watch others or adjust the screen-sharing feature where you can see the latest image editing technique being used by someone else. Watching tutorials is another way to learn, as is using reference images. If you are not a photo editor, you can search the internet and find plenty of reference images that look like the one you need to edit.

A cohort study of upper extremity nerve palsies at a Veterans Affairs medical center in the United States. To describe the clinical characteristics of hand and arm paresis associated with antecedent peripheral nerve injury. We performed a cohort study of 150 patients with upper extremity nerve palsies attending a Veterans Affairs Medical Center (VAMC). Demographic and clinical data were abstracted from the medical record. Disabilities of Arm, Shoulder, and Hand (DASH) scores and pain intensity were assessed with patient self-report. Patterns of referral were evaluated, and the relationship between upper extremity nerve palsies and peripheral neuropathy was assessed. Odds ratios and logistic regression models were used to assess for associations between potential risk factors and paresis. A referral pattern suggestive of chronic constriction injury was present in 72.6% of upper extremity nerve palsy patients. Of note, only oral anticoagulant therapy was a significant risk factor for upper extremity nerve palsy after adjusting for other covariates (adjusted odds ratio [OR], 2.0; 95% confidence interval [CI], 1.2 to 3.5). Of the 159 patients with peripheral neuropathy present, 61.9% had paresis with 29.8% having neuropathic symptoms and 31.1% fibromyalgia. Substantial upper extremity paresis occurs at a rate of 13.3 cases per 1000 person years at a VAMC. Anticoagulants may be a risk factor for upper extremity nerve palsy. Our findings suggest that upper extremity nerve palsies are often misdiagnosed or under-diagnosed as they lack the characteristic findings of peripheral neuropathy.
