The cerebellar cortex of pigeons (Columba livia) consists of a deep and a superficial layer. The cerebellar cortex is divided into an upper and a lower part by the dentate nucleus. The principal layer of the cortex is delimited by two oblique cerebellar fissures. The granular layer is composed of small granule cells. The granule cells receive the mossy fiber axons of the granule cells and they are in turn in contact with the parallel fibers. The Purkinje cells are approximately 12 in number and their somata are round and contain a nucleus and a small amount of heterochromatin. Their dendrites are distributed over the granular layer. These Purkinje cells are in direct contact with the parallel fibers. They receive input from the cerebellar nuclei and they give rise to the climbing fibers which synapse on the somata of the Purkinje cells and then on the parallel fibers. The stellate and basket cells are located in the granular layer and they have large cell bodies. They are in close contact with the granule cells. The basket cells are characterized by their contacts with the mossy fibers. Their dendrites are spherical and in the stratum lucidum they are in contact with each other. The stellate cells are spindle shaped and they have one or two dendrites which may enter the cerebellar nuclei. The Golgi and the basket cells are stained by the Golgi-Bodenreich methods. The Purkinje cells are stained by the Klüver-Barrera method.Q: Use database.find() as a variable When I create a method, I use database.find() as a variable db.find({}, function(err, results) { //var x = results; //console.log(x); res.json(x); }); However, I don't want to hard code in the results from the database. How can I get the results as a variable? A: Use
