The ability to archive your images has been significantly improved. The new [Archive] button in the File menu gives you the option of converting images to JPEG over time or select snapshots when archiving. If you're using a [Digital Darkroom] add-on, switching the folder settings to [Exported] will automatically save snapshots to your Lightroom catalog every time you export. The [Last Import Date...] option allows you to see exactly which images have been imported into an archive. Whether you choose to use the importable snapshots or not, you'll need to manually purge the snapshots to avoid confusion later on. The new Close View (shown in Figure 3) communicates with the intention to close an image in the gradient view (Figure 4), and you can quickly access the Close View. The Close View itself is a 3d space with background color for the surrounding area. This supports a couple of reoccurring questions about the gradient view. When you see the pointer change into a close appearance while you are holding down modifier keys, it is telling you that you are in a Close View. Conversely, if you only see the pointer change while pressing a modifier key, it is not a Close View, but instead the status bar.
