Finally, it's time to use the face-recognition that the new iPhone 7 Plus has. The camera app has the best implementation of it I've seen so far. Once you've selected "Face Forensics", a small window will pop up where you'll specify what facial features are most important to the app — eyes, nose, and mouth are most commonly used. If you've mastered the camera's manual focus and exposure settings, you're probably fine, but I still recommend making a test shot before working to ensure you have the perfect settings for your subject. Face Forensics is incredibly intelligent — it gives you the best settings it thinks your exposure will render at that particular ISO setting previously discussed. I enjoy using the color and sepia modes to pick out details or adjust colors. I've fond memories of using similar tools in Adobe and Corel on old Mac Plus machines (like having to go through ProPhoto Tools manual mode before you could even use Sepia). If you need work you can't do in an image editor, I think there are a couple of tools that will eventually work. Vanishing Point is a clever tool for making vanishing points at any time in Photoshop. The bad news is that it's complex to use. If you'd like to spend the time, you can create a vanishing point in Photoshop's other tools before using Vanishing Point. If you're looking for a quick and dirty, simple way to widen an image enough to use it in a layout, I've found Content-Aware Fill to be useful. Adobe's experience with the iPad Pro and its Pencil has allowed its software engineering team to really fine-tune the applications' touch and Pencil integration. I'm already snapping in Photoshop using Pencil, and it works flawlessly. I don't use the in-app controls for much at all. It's a much better tool to allow me to edit photos on the iPad with a lot fewer buttons.
